≗ Conceptual Approach

Indigenous Voices focuses on language as an entry point into understanding the importance of storytelling for Indigenous people within Teejop. The purpose of the project is to create awareness of these previously unknown histories, often unspoken or erased from public knowledge, and to activate them through the words selected by Indigenous artists in collaboration with the Native Art Market. Using printmaking, particularly silk-screen and risograph, the montage of text and image based posters is activated throughout the city of Madison, serving as a canvas to illustrate the cultural, political, and social issues that many Indigenous people face today. The use of language serves to acknowledge our shared histories, experiences, and stories. It serves to center Indigenous voices as catalysts for change.

≜ Project Description (400 words or less)

Indigenous Voices is a year long project in which Dakota Mace will gather stories by artists participating in the 2025 Native Art Market held on November 8, and combine language from these stories, images, and design to create a series of prints that will be distributed and displayed widely, popping up randomly in various Madison neighborhoods in a variety of indoor and outdoor settings between May and October, 2026. The prints may appear in a shop window or on a community bulletin board. Or you might encounter a series of prints staked in the ground or posted in elevators. Volunteers will assist Dakota in selecting unique locations and gaining any necessary permissions to display the prints. Printmaking will allow a large number of pieces to be produced and for these works of art to be ephemeral. Their impact will be amplified by the 6-month duration of their appearance in the community.

This project will coincide with the Teejop Community History Public Art Project. That project provides five specific learning locations. Indigenous Voices will be complimentary, providing another way for the public to pause, reflect, and learn during everyday encounters with Indigenous artwork spread throughout the community.

Arts + Literature Laboratory will serve as fiscal sponsor for this project.
