

Poetry Recitation for September 18, 2012 Common Council Meeting

Ode to the Crossing Guard for Russell, who watches over Edgewood & Monroe

Who asks my son where his sister has gone to college and how she likes it.
Who waves as if he wants to hand me a cloud
as I pass his corner morning and afternoon.
Who hands my kids a Mother's Day card and tells them to sign and give it to me.
Who is happy to hear Northwestern because I'm from Chicago.
Who yells slow down at the cars even when there aren't kids waiting to cross this busy road that killed another cat last night.

Who holds back drivers while bicyclists escape
another face-to-face with death.
Who never misses a school day.
Who teases my son for not wearing a coat in the cold then shares the joke with a shout across the street at me later.
Who has pieced us together over years of bringing our neighborhood peace.

Who arrives early with his collection of orange cones then sits in the car reading the paper until it's time to center them in his intersection. Who says hello, hello, hello, hello, each greeting as cheerful as the first. Who calls me young lady.
Who crosses over one afternoon to gift me with a folded clipping, pointing at the thumb-sized photo, Isn't this your smiling face? Whose name I only just now think to ask.

—Wendy Vardaman

About the Poet

Wendy Vardaman, www.wendyvardaman.com, is Poet Laureate of Madison with Sarah Busse, and co-editor/webmaster of Verse Wisconsin, www.versewisconsin.org, and Cowfeather Press, www.cowfeatherpress.org. She is the author of Obstructed View (Fireweed Press 2009) and co-editor of the 2013 Wisconsin Poets' Calendar. In addition to poetry, she writes essays and interviews. She has a Ph.D. in English from the University of Pennsylvania and works part-time for The Young Shakespeare Players. With husband Thomas DuBois she has three children and does not own a car.