Fiscal Note

The revised rules include two provisions which will result in a modest increase in expenditures, the extent of which is dependent on how often the provisions are used. The first provision relates to probationary employees. Under the current rules, an employee who has a one-year probationary period (as approved by the Human Resources Director) rather than the standard six-month period receives a step increase at the end of the probationary period. The new rules would provide the step increase at the end of six months of employment. This change would result in advancement to all subsequent steps (an increase of about four percent each) six months earlier than under the present rules. Historically, there have been relatively few cases where employees are hired with a one-year probationary period. The second provision relates to promoted employees. Under the current rules, a promoted employee's salary is set at the next higher step closest to the employee's current salary. The new rules allow the Human Resources Director to authorize hiring above the minimum when the employee has exceptional qualifications and/or experience and the job announcement states that potential applicants may be hired above the minimum of the salary range. The cost will be dependent on the extent this provision is used by the Human Resources Director.
